The paper was renamed the Ashcroft Journal in 1899. In 1969 the newspaper became the Ashcroft-Cache Creek Journal, and then simply the Journal in 1979. From 1980 to 1984 the newspaper was published to include a regional newspaper, the Logan Lake Leader, after which the Logan Lake Leader became an independent publication. In 1988 the newspaper became the Ashcroft-Cache Creek Journal again briefly, before adding regional content from Logan Lake again to become the Ashcroft-Cache Creek-Logan Lake Journal. 1992 saw the newspaper become the South Cariboo-Thompson Journal, but it would become the Ashcroft-Cache Creek Journal again in 1995 and continues to publish as such.

by Hollinger Inc. (the media conglomerate of Conrad Black), when it was sold to Glacier Media. The newspaper would close in 2014.

Kamloops Daily Sentinel

The Inland Sentinel was established in May 1880 by John Hagan, a newspaper serving the Central Interior region of British Columbia with headquarters in Emory, B.C. and shortly after in Yale, B.C. In 1884 the newspaper moved to Kamloops, with the first Kamloops issue published on July 31, 1884 and establishing headquarters east of town. A new building was built in 1886 between the Kamloops Courthouse and Gordon, but Hagan sold the paper later that year to Hugh McCutcheon. The paper would move again in 1897 (Raven's Hall) and 1912 (northwest of old Federal building, then the Beckman block). In 1896 the paper was bought by a syndicate headed by Senator Hewitt Bostock. By 1900 Mark Wade was the editor of the paper, and would soon become its owner until 1912 when it changed hands to D.B. Johnstone.

In 1916 the newspaper would merge with the Kamloops Standard (1897-1910) to form the Kamloops Standard-Sentinel.

The paper would merge again in 1924, when it was acquired by R.G. Patterson, the owner of the Kamloops Telegram (1916-1924). The new paper would be called the Kamloops Sentinel. In 1926 a new building was erected at 209 Victoria Street, and the next year a book binding operation was added to their printing capabilities. 1932 saw the company branch out and acquire CFJC radio, with an increase in newspaper frequency to include Monday extras. In 1954 a new building was built, with an official opening happening in 1955 which also saw the change from a weekly publication to a daily publication.

The paper's name was changed to reflect the increased publication to the Kamloops Daily Sentinel and continued to be well-regarded in the community and across Canada until it closed in 1987.
